Angie Richman is currently serving as the Communication Specialist for the National Park Service Climate Change Response Program. Angie is tasked with maintaining the external and internal NPS climate change web pages, producing a monthly newsletter and webinar series for NPS staff across the country, developing climate change training programs, and leading the creation of a communication action plan for climate change response. She endeavors to increase climate science literacy among park interpreters and develop communication products that play to the strength of park staff and of the power of the visitor experience. Over the past 12 years Angie has worked in 9 different national park units and a regional office. She is trained as a front line interpreter but also applies her background in science to resource management objectives. She received a BA in Astrophysics from the University of New Mexico with a minor in Archaeology, emphasizing Cultural Astronomy.
